I am very tired today because I have been to a S1 training camp for three days with my classmates. Today is the last day. However, I feel glad as I have broadened my horizons through the activities in this camp.

On the first day, my class went to a campsite in Sai Kung and we met our instructor. He introduced himself to us and told us to call him “Kenny”. Then, we started to be trained by Kenny through a lot of activities. The first rule of this camp was that we needed to be polite all the time no matter what we did. Serving teachers was the second rule of the camp. This was due to the fact that teachers deserve to be served as they have devoted a lot of time and effort to teach us.

Yesterday after breakfast, we did some activities. Among all the activities, I liked “Over the Beam” the most. However, this game was very difficult. We needed to “transport” our classmates from one side to another side of the beam and we had to finish the whole process within 18 minutes. Luckily, we finished the task in 17 minutes and 58 seconds. At last, I slept well last night because I was very tired.

Today, we had to go back to school. I miss this camp very much. I not only have learnt the importance of co-operating with others, but also judge things from different perspectives.
