Many young people seem to think voluntary work is a waste of time, and teenagers nowadays avoid it.

Some teenagers do voluntary work with no heart, because it is a school requirement, and this disappoints me. They are superficial and their life values are muddled. Most of them use money to measure value. They live in a material world. They have never been poor, and they don't care about others.

Materialism is a dark tunnel, but they don't know anything else. I was lucky enough to discover a brighter path.

My first time as a volunteer was inspired by a social worker called Miss Nip. I learned that voluntary work can enrich my life as I can help others and learn new ways of doing different things.

I can meet different people and make friends with them to enrich my experience. It's a meaningful job, and I learned that happiness does not only depend on money.

The most important thing in the relationship between the volunteers and the needy is "love". If there were no love between us, the world would be a dark place.
